

As the blue sky shone over head, the greenery choked the buildings as the abandoned city become a home to new life. Ivy choked the walls of the house and curled through the roof. Derelict buildings stood lifeless and alone, waiting for its next prey. Beating down on the forgotten city, the sun was the only thing that reminded us, about the life that once lived there.

Echoing through the quiet streets, birds whistled in search for answer. In the distance, trickling water from the river provided a sense of saviour for the insects.

Dilapidated buildings from this previous concrete jungle have no choice but to submit to the untamed beasts of the Earth. Twisting and turning, the thick layers of vines and ivy continue to suffocate and strangle the crumbling brickwork: unsatisfied until all unoccupied space has been utilised.
